

Origins of Feydorian Feybloom

The Myth of Feybloom

Long before the Lich cast its shadow upon Feydor, when the forests whispered their secrets to the stars, and mortals still walked unknowing of their gods, there came the tale of Feybloom—a gift of beauty, born of tragedy and divine will.

It is said that in the days of the First Spring, when the earth's magic was young and unbound, the goddess Valynir roamed Feydor's groves. Valynir, mistress of the life-bound bloom and keeper of all growing things, walked among mortals disguised in mortal form, tending to the roots and nurturing the shoots of their fragile forests. The mortals revered her unknowingly, calling her the Wanderer of the Green.

But as years passed and Feydor flourished under her touch, jealousy stirred within Greenden, the Keeper of Balance and lord of orderly growth. Greenden, seeing Valynir's abundance, grew uneasy, for he believed the mortals would grow reckless, their forests unchecked, their dominion over nature too strong. He sought to impose restraint, to show the mortals that nature's bounty was not without cost.

One fateful season, Greenden came upon Feydor cloaked in his mantle of vines and thorns. The lush groves trembled as he approached, his voice like the creak of ancient trees. "Valynir," he declared, "your gifts are plenty, but too much plenty leads to ruin. The mortals grow dependent. Let me temper your touch so the balance may be restored."

But Valynir shook her head. "Greenden, must you always seek the scale? Life is more than balance—it is growth, chaos, and renewal. Let the mortals prosper, for their forests mirror the wild and unyielding heart of the world."

Unmoved, Greenden extended his hand, and with it, vines snaked across the land. The forests wilted. The rivers slowed to a trickle. And Feydor, once thriving, began to fade. Valynir, heartbroken, descended to the barren soil, her tears falling to the earth. "If you must take the wild from the forests, let it remain within the hearts of those who dwell here," she pleaded, her voice carrying the weight of her grief.

And so her tears took root. From the ash and despair rose the Feybloom—a flower unlike any other. Its petals shimmered with hues not of the mortal realm, shifting between gold and green and violet as if kissed by the divine. Its roots burrowed deep, drawing magic from the earth itself, restoring what Greenden's vines had stilled. The mortals, upon discovering this bloom, marveled at its beauty, and Valynir's voice echoed softly through their minds:

Remember that balance is the heart of all growth, but beauty will always find a way.

Greenden, seeing the Feybloom, paused. Though his nature demanded order, he could not help but admire the beauty born from Valynir's sorrow. He allowed the Feybloom to flourish, weaving it into his vision of balance—life restored through both loss and resilience.

And so the flower remains—a gift of a grieving goddess and a tempered god, a reminder that balance and beauty walk hand in hand, forever blooming in the hearts of mortals.